Not illustrated. 1839 Excerpt: ...no hearts were ever braver Upon your bounding wave, or the plains of Onnabuoy. Five times our men were turned, by rivals whom they spurned, With shame their cheeks they burned, but the ball was in the field; Then, with redoubled spirit, they shewed the strength and merit That they did all inherit, and made their foes to yield; While Barrymore they doubted, and Muskerry they shouted, When both of them were routed on the plains of Onnabuoy. The south by mearings.f-bounded, at first our boys confounded, Upon the wind they rounded, then tried their utmost speed; An old name for Carrigaline, and still appended to it as an aliat in law writings. t Certain boundaries within which the game is to be decided are laid down at goal; these depend, of course, upon the number of players, and the character of the country. A stream, a road, a wall, or any other obvious line of demarkation, is sufficient; but when such is not readily found, sticks called mearings, or mearing twigs, are placed in the ground. It is the Saxon word CDarie, which is used by Spenser.--And Hygate made the mean thereof by west--Fairy Queen, III. ix. 40. a proof, among many others which may be adduced, that several obsolete English words are still current in Ireland. Against both hill and weather, they all bore on together, And pucked the well-sewed leather; twas wonderful, indeed: The north was then contested, on that their last hope rested, But soon they were down-crested on the plains of Onnabuoy. Two baronies of boasters, one district of our coasters, Have made look foolish toasters, and their former fame undone; For lost is now the honour of their leader, Mister Conner, Whose mother has upon her all my pity for her son. In Copes field ends the story of the...
