

Chronic Pulmonary Hyperinflation (Current Topics in Rehabilitation)

The workshops that have been held over the past few years and the volumes published in their wake have proved highly successful and have prompted us to press on with our initial plans. Our basic aim was to tackle certain very important problems in respiratory rehabilitation and then discuss the various issues with people from all over the world engaged in the updating of experience and knowledge in this field. We therefore firmly believe that this ongoing effort is of fundamental importance. Hyperinflation, which is still a poorly defined clinical and physiopathological condition, is the focal point of this present study, which is aimed at discussing and weighing up the physiopathological mechanisms, clinical consequences, and rehabilitation possibilities in a disease in which, until relatively recently, rehabilitation had seemed almost totally ineffective. The present contributions, however, show us how very important and versatile rehabilitation may be in its treatment. Perhaps, if we consider this branch of medicine as one which now no longer simply draws upon other sciences, but make an active contribution in its own right, we will have touched upon the most important aspect of this study. If I may, I would just like to add how very pleasing it is for me to acknowledge how much this joint effort has contributed, in terms of true insights and above all VI results, to finding solutions to the problems addressed in recent years.
